

Adam, Robert 1728 - 1792

Robert Adam was born in Kirkcaldy, Fife, Scotland on 3 July 1728. He was the son of the architect William Adam (1689-1748) under whom he trained. He also studied at Edinburgh University from 1743. Following the death of his father in 1748, Robert Adam and his elder brother, John Adam (1721-1792) formed a partnership to run his architectural and construction business in Edinburgh. By 1754 the business was profitable enough for Robert Adam to embark on a Grand Tour of Europe, He returned in January 1757 and the following year set up an architectural and decorative design practice in London. He was soon joined by his brothers, James Adam (1732-1794) and William Adam (1738-1822). Before long, Robert Adam was acknowledged as the leading architect in Britain and the Adam practice was one of the busiest in England between the 1750s and the 1780s,

He secured the patronage of the Duke of Argyll and Lord Bute and in 1761, Lord Bute obtained for him the post of Architect of the King's Works which he held until 1769. In 1757 he became a member of the Society of Arts and in 1769 was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1765 he was appointed Surveyor to Chelsea Hospital, a position he held until his death. Robert Adam died in London, England on 3 March 1792.
