

Rickman, Thomas 1776 - 1841

Thomas Rickman was born in Maidenhead, Berkshire, England on 8 June 1776. His father was a surgeon and he also trained in the medical profession practising first in London from 1797 to 1801 and then in Lewes, Sussex from 1801 to 1803. In 1803 he abandoned medicine and embarked in what was to prove an unsuccessful business venture. In 1808 he moved to Liverpool where he worked as an insurance clerk. It was at this time that he developed an interest in architecture and lectured and wrote a number of articles and essays on the subject. He was champion of Gothic architecture, a style he helped to promote through his influential book An Attempt to Discriminate the Styles of English Architecture from the Conquest to the Reformation. First published in 1817, it ran through to seven editions by 1901.

His writings led to him receiving a commission to design several churches in the Liverpool area from John Cragg, the owner of a local iron foundry. In December 1817 Rickman established an architectural practice in Liverpool and the following year took Henry Hutchinson (1800–1831) as his pupil and assistant, making him a partner in his practice in 1821.

In 1820 Rickman settled in Birmingham where he opened a second office at 5 Cannon Street. He relocated the practice to 45 Ann Street, Birmingham in 1826. Hutchinson died in November 1831. Rickman was then in partnership his brother, Edwin Swan Rickman (1790–1873), until 1834 when he was replaced by Richard Charles Hussey (1802–1887).

Rickman was plagued by ill health in the 1830s and subsequently retired in c.1838, leaving the practice to Hussey. Rickman died at his home, 17 Albion

Street, Birmingham on 4 January 1841. Hussey continued to run the practice for a number of years.
