

MacLaren, James Marjoribanks

James Marjoribanks MacLaren [also known as James M. MacLaren and as James MacLaren] was born in Kincardine, Perthshire, Scotland [1] on 12 January 1853 and was articled to James Salmon (1805-1888) of Salmon, Son & Ritchie in Glasgow from c.1868 to 1872. After working briefly as an assistant in the office of James Salmon & Son in Glasgow he moved to London, where he worked as an assistant to Campbell Douglas (1828-1910) and James Sellars (1843-1888) of Campbell Douglas & Sellars from 1873 to 1875; to John James Stevenson (1831-1908) and Edward Robert Robson (1835-1917) of Stevenson & Robson in 1875; to Charles Henry Howell (1823?-1905) from 1875 to c.1881; to Richard Coad (1825-1900) from c.1875 to c.1883; and to William Young (1843-1900) from c.1881 to c.1883.

In 1883 MacLaren formed a partnership with Coad as Coad & MacLaren. The practice had an office at 3, Duke Street, Adelphi, London. The partnership was dissolved in 1887 and MacLaren set up his own independent practice nearby at 21 King William Street. During his years in London, MacLaren attended the Royal Academy Schools and in 1886 was elected a member of the Art Workers Guild.

MacLaren's buildings crystallised the ideals of the Arts and Crafts movement of the 1880s and he is acknowledged as "the pathfinder for Charles Rennie Mackintosh's uniquely personal interpretation and development of Scottish traditional architecture" [2]

MacLaren died in Hampstead, London on 20 October 1890.
