

Mackintosh, Charles Rennie 1868 - 1928

Charles Rennie Mackintosh was born Charles Rennie McIntosh in Dennistoun, Glasgow, Scotland, on 7 January 1868. From 1884 to 1888 he was an articled to John Hutchison (c.1841-1908) in Glasgow. In late 1888 or early 1889 he began working a draughtsman with Honeyman and Keppie, a recently-established Glasgow-based architectural practice formed by John Honeyman (1831-1914) and John Keppie (1862-1945). From 1883 to 1894 Mackintosh also attended evening classes at Glasgow School of Art. In c.1896 he became senior assistant to Honeyman & Keppie, and, following the retirement of Honeyman in January 1901, he was taken into partnership and the practice title became Honeyman, Keppie & Mackintosh. In 1900 he married Margaret Macdonald (1864-1933), with whom he would subsequently collaborate on projects.

The partnership with Honeyman and Keppie was dissolved in June 1913 and Mackintosh set up his own independent practice in Glasgow. After living briefly in Walberswick, Suffolk, in August 1915 the Mackintoshes moved to Chelsea in London where they established studios at 43A, Glebe Place. In January 1924 they moved to France and over the next three years lived in Amelie-les-bains, Ille-sur-Tet and Port Vendres. By September 1927, for reasons of health, they were forced to return to London, where Charles Rennie Mackintosh died on 10 December 1928.

In addition to his work as an architect, Mackintosh was also a painter and a versatile designer in many fields including textiles, jewellery, furniture, interiors, tiles, books, wallpaper, and stained glass. Between 1891 and 1923 he exhibited at the Royal Glasgow Institute of the Fine Arts, Goupil Gallery in London, and at the Royal Scottish Academy of Painters in Water Colours.

'A beautiful living thing'. Performance Research vol. 22, no. 1, January 2017 pp. 115-119 ["On the 23rd May 2014 fire spread through The Glasgow School of Art, Charles Rennie Mackintosh's masterpiece, badly damaging the heart of the School. In the immediate aftermath of the fire there was an overwhelming response evidencing a sense of loss and sadness amongst GSA's worldwide community. This emotional reaction developed into a desire to engage with the Mackintosh Building, and this research project being one of several focused on the building. Following this tragic event, Birrell and Crotch were both driven by a desire to record the irrevocable damage, and the concept of 'A Beautiful Living Thing' developed. Both authors independently felt a connection with the building in the context of their own research, Birrell's fascination with the relationship of music and place, and Crotch's concerns with embodied experience and memory. The ambition was to capture and record the beauty within the building viewing the restoration of this damaged work of art from the immediate aftermath of the fire, and through the process of restoration to completion. Through discussion the project developed and it was agreed that a series of three films would be produced; designed as a series of visual 'movements' each would be aligned to mark significant stages of rehabilitation of the building; before, during and after the restoration work. Film 1 (completed) places a single musician within the damaged library, and records a new composition transposed from the words of Mackintosh 'A Beautiful Living Thing'. Film 2 (currently in the editing stage) will concern itself with 'improvisation' in response to the improvisatory nature of fire and takes place during the reconstruction phase. Film 3 will celebrate completion and a new beginning through a choral piece. This is a linear project that has been conceived as a whole but with each part having independent legitimacy." Abstract]

Some cities may develop and promote an emblematic architect and his or her architectural heritage/legacy, like the examples of Glasgow and Charles Rennie Mackintosh and Barcelona and Antonio Gaudi. Furthermore, this article will focus on the way tourism can lead local actors in cities to go even further and to continue to build their architecture, even after the death of the architects. A phenomenon appears where architecture is posthumously continuing to be built, leading to the production and creation of simulacra and facsimiles (for example of Mackintosh architecture in Glasgow and Gaudi architecture in Barcelona) for tourist, commercial and heritage reasons. This article aims to present and discuss how architectural heritage can be produced and transformed 'for' and 'by' tourism, a fascinating change in these cities which has also been the subject of criticism and leads to many questions". Innerleighen, Scotland: Robin Crichton, 2013. ["In 1923, Charles Rennie Mackintosh and his wife Margaret MacDonald went on holiday to Roussillon in the South of France to rest and recuperate. Her health was poor and as an architect and designer he had become outmoded. They were completely enchanted. The holiday became a permanent stay and Mackintosh rapidly developed his talents as an artist. They spent the last and possibly the happiest years of their life together in this earthly paradise, which is Roussillon. Robin Crichton follows in Mackintosh's footsteps rediscovering as he did the culture and beauty of the region and how it inspired his painting. Crichton's own love of Roussillon shines through as he elegiac prose sits in perfect harmony with Mackintosh's splendid paintings" [Publisher's note]

Various owners have attempted to remedy the problem with limited success. In 2019 the current owner, the National Trust for Scotland, took the bold step to cover the entire building in a contemporary structure, the Big Box, in order to arrest water ingress, buy time to develop a solution, and engage with the public over this conservation dilemma. This paper explores the technical and philosophical issues that finding a solution presents, and outlines what effects the water ingress has had on the collections and interior decorations. It explores the approaches taken to date with the management of the exterior and interior surfaces of the building, and the environmental management strategy adopted as one element of a solution. It additionally notes that changes to Mackintosh's original decorative scheme, which included furniture, fixtures and fittings, have occurred over time, and discusses the Trust's approach to managing the collections in this iconic building". Abstract ]

history of the Victorian art school as a distinctive building type. It explores the precedents for the school in Manchester, Birmingham, and London, and reveals that its design was informed by predominantly environmental considerations. The internal spaces of Victorian art schools display an unprecedented qualitative concern for the provision of light in the context of the soot-laden skies of the industrial city. The Glasgow School of Art was also equipped with a mechanical plenum system that provided clean and tempered air in variable quantities to the different spaces of the building. The innovativeness of this system has been widely disputed — this paper aims to cast light on its precedents and situate its significance in the wider history of the development of building servicing. This includes discussion of a contemporary report detailing the engineers' commissioning of the building in 1910, as well as a recent study undertaken to evaluate the environmental management of the school today. The paper demonstrates that the Glasgow School of Art represents a key milestone in the development of our modern conception of the internal environment of large buildings, brought about in response to the atmospheric degradation of the industrial city. The sophisticated integration of the environmental qualities of the Arts and Crafts movement with thoroughly modern servicing technology is indicative not only of Mackintosh's principle of 'total design', but also of the architectural possibilities inherent in the construction of a particularly specialised building type in a specific time and place". Abstract]

Thomas Haworth and the Glasgow School of Art did much to document and preserve his work; following the appearance of Howarth's monograph in 1952, and an exhibition in 1953, interest in Mackintosh began to revive. Further exhibitions and publications, and reproductions of his furniture, contributed to the continuing growth of Mackintosh's reputation, but many of the architect's buildings remained under threat and a Society was formed to campaign for their preservation and to foster interest in his work. Recent years have seen additional publications, with more in prospect, and including the Mackintosh Society's regular Newsletter, together with some television productions." Abstract]

Powell, Kristie. "The artist couple": Collectivism in Margaret Macdonald's and Charles Rennie Mackintosh's modern interior designs of 1900-1906. M. A. thesis, University of Cincinnati, 2010. ["Margaret Macdonald (1864-1933) was a Scottish artist and designer whose marriage to the internationally renowned architect and designer, Charles Rennie Mackintosh (1868-1928), has partly obscured the importance of her contributions to art and design. Her collective approach was, in fact, part of what Mackintosh called her "genius," while he considered his own contributions to their projects more akin to "talent or ability." This study is part of the recent scholarship that brings attention to Macdonald's contributions and crucial roles in collective design work of the modern era. Introducing the study, I evaluate the role of collectivism as it informs Macdonald's and Mackintosh's tea-room designs. Next, I examine the influence of the Arts and Crafts style on the design of the couple's Mains Street flat home. The modern revival of practices used by medieval guilds includes Macdonald's use of the medium gesso, as I discuss in the second chapter of the study. In concluding, I discuss the "Gesamtkunstwerk," the total work of art, in relation to the Music Room that the Scottish couple created for Franz Waerndorfer. With the current study's focus on Macdonald's and Mackintosh's interior designs, I hope to augment understandings of collectivism in order to acknowledge unsung contributions of many modern women and other producers; the hopes that such thinking may continue to inform art making and design today". Abstract]

Mackintosh's chosen tour of Italy is one of the best-documented periods of his career in terms of primary sources as he kept a diary which forms the basis of the book's narrative. CRM landed at Naples on 5th April 1891 and after a week there and a brief visit to Sicily he worked his way up Italy, ending his tour at Pavia that July. This paper aims to analyze the influences of these teachings on Charles Rennie Mackintosh during the design process of the Glasgow School of Art, due to the prominent role of such school in contemporary architecture and his saliency as one of its major representatives. Our objective is to transcend the formal approaches that have been made in the preceding publications to attempt to reveal the mechanisms inherited from the study of vernacular buildings in the methodology that Mackintosh used in this project. To support the hypothesis, this essay not only analyzes the previous writings, but also the original sources of the graphic material developed by Mackintosh and archived in the Glasgow School of Art, the University of Glasgow and the National Library of Ireland in Dublin. A circular route is planned that with the education of Mackintosh in Glasgow, continues with the medieval architectures drawn in Britain and Italy, and culminates with the proposal for the educational building back to his Scottish hometown." Abstract]
